GEMS Program

Internship

Aberdeen Proving Grounds

July 2014

- Students who will enter Geometry, Algebra II, or beyond learn principles of computer aided design (CAD), applications of additive manufacturing and investigate the science of motion, exploring conditions that affect objects in motion. Students will build catapults and compete in a challenge to study the science of motion and force. Students also learned about data collection using a variety of tools as well as probability and statistics. Using Tinkercad, students designed catapult parts to be 3D printed by staff members. Army scientists working in the additive manufacturing field will engaged with students daily.
